

Table of Contents

Acknowledgements	ix
Introduction	xi
Background of the Study: Entering the Research Field	xi
The Three ‘Turns’	xiv
Outline of the Study	xix
1 Theoretical Starting Points	1
Researching Vernacular Religion	1
Music as a Hallmark of Contemporary Religiosity	9
Jewish Music and Change: Special Focus Areas	14
A New Sonic Space for Jewish Music	22
2 Entering the Ethnographic Field	25
Methodological Perspectives	25
Introducing the Ethnography	30
Features in the Interview Material	34
“Religion is a Complicated Matter”	47
3 Dinah: Radical and Liberal in Theology, Traditional in Practice	51
“Doing Jewish” the Traditional Way	52
“Niggunim Can Feel Evangelical”	54
“The Physicality of Music”	57
“Prayer Is Possible Only When Women and Men Are Fully Equal”	63
4 Micah: Music as a Bridge between Diverse Jewish Experiences	67
Changing Jewish Identity	68
“Music as a Mystical Practice”	73
Poetic Beauty – Intellectual Integrity	79
5 Esther: Singing as a Form of Understanding	83
“Moving to the Right Liturgically”	85
“God Is the Hardest Thing to Talk about in Words”	89
Looking Backwards, Moving Forwards	95
6 David: The Wish to Have a Broader Sort of Thing	97
“The Idea of Pure, Rational Religion Is a Very Dated One”	98
Musical Explorations	104

"An Association with the 'Old World'"	109
7 Rachel: "It's Not the Words, It's the Melodies"	111
Turning to Tradition	113
Music Comes First	117
Not an Isolated Journey	123
Conclusion	125
Music as an Instigator and Insignia of Religious Change	127
The Three Turns Confirmed, Challenged and Contradicted	130
The Role of Music and Concrete Musical Practices	134
The Broader Implications for the Jewish Sonic Space	140
Appendix	143
Glossary	145
References	149
Websites	153
Index	155
About the Author	159