

Ever since humans started raising questions about the conditions of their existence, the theme of “environment” played an important role. This book assembles the intellectual, theological and philosophical history of the concept of “environment” in Judaism, Christianity and Islam. Commonalities and differences between the three traditions are examined, as well as past and current controversies.

THE SERIES: KEY CONCEPTS IN INTERRELIGIOUS DISCOURSES

The book series Key Concepts in Interreligious Discourses (KCID) brings together academic studies of essential concepts and discourses in Judaism, Christianity and Islam. It offers a new approach to the study of these religions by investigating the original understandings and major developments of the central concepts responsible for shaping each one of these traditions. It also pays attention to the ways in which these concepts are related to one another. The aim of the series is to establish an archeology of religious knowledge, which can enable a new understanding of religious concepts as evolving products of living discourses that emerge under diverse historical and cultural circumstances. The series intends to create a new conceptual platform capable of engendering further interreligious discourses and fruitful interreligious exchange. <https://www.bafid.fau.de>
